

Unions express concern over government's working time initiative

🇫🇮 Finland

The JHL public services union and the SAK confederation have raised concerns about the government's approach to working time and possible changes to working time legislation. A government working group has come up with proposals that would allow for more local flexibility on working time while failing to put forward any concrete plans to regulate zero-hours contracts which currently affect 80000 workers in Finland. The unions argue that the proposals are more about flexibility for employers than workers and that all workers should have a guaranteed minimum number of hours in their contracts.
